

Missing Calls: Stop Missing So Many Calls

Kelly Copeland

NCAA Division One Official in Ohio

A camper recently asked what single thing helped me more than any other in "moving up the ladder." My answer was, "I stopped missing so many calls." I was serious. Continuing the conversation, I realized I could attribute my acquired ability to get more calls correct to three basic elements. Each and every element had been drilled into my head at almost every camp I had ever attended.

Here they are.

Officiate only what you can see

I realized I had to stop trying to officiate every single play in a ballgame. Sounds ridiculous, huh? In retrospect, I had believed I needed to have a whistle on every play that just didn't look right. The fact that I was guessing about 50% of the time hadn't occurred to me. The more I watched myself on tape or observed a game in person, the more I was convinced that this was a major mistake that we make as basketball officials. This point is summarized in two ideas. First, don't guess. Second, trust your partners if you're not in a good position to make a sound judgment call on a particular play. Too often, we make a call from a poor position only to have players, coaches, fans, and co-officials give us the ol' "What was that?" look.

Have a patient whistle

The second thing I realized I had done was to develop the ability to have a "patient whistle". More often than not, we must allow the entire play to finish before we make a decision on blowing the whistle. This is easier said than done. However, when officials let the play happen before they put air in the whistle, the percentage of calls they get right goes up dramatically. Too often we react to a sound or anticipate illegal contact. Hold your whistle! At least for a second. You'll get more plays right.

Officiate the defense

The third element is an oldie, but goodie. We've heard the phrase "Officiate the defense!" for years. I've had it explained to me in great detail by a number of successful basketball officials. Why, then, is it so hard to do this? As we played or watched the game for most of our pre-officiating lives, we watched the ball. That is where the action is. As officials, however, we must train ourselves to watch the defensive player. It's extremely difficult to do it right. Only by watching the defender can we be sure who initiates contact. If contact occurs and we are watching the defender, we can correctly judge if he or she is adhering to legal defensive principles. Otherwise, we're guessing. Here's a drill taught by Bailey Marshall for developing this skill. When observing a game (camp setting or otherwise), call out the number of the primary defender. I sometime use it in actual games to force myself to find the defender and get my eyes off the dribbler. You'll be amazed how clearly the block/charge can be officiated if you're watching the defensive players.

Simple . . . but, not easy
